

Albert C. Bramante
Instructor/Professor of Psychology
Union County College
Cranford NJ 07016

Experiential Learning in online developmental psychology courses

It is understood that students who complete coursework online are expected to work independently with minimal supervision. Often students in some of these classes report that learning did not take place. Recent trends in learning and teaching pedagogy emphasize experiential or hands on approach as a method to engage students. This process can easily be implemented in online/web courses. Examples of this includes engaging in service work with children, writing educational brochures for parents & teachers, and designing hypothetical programs that would work with children and adults. I will share assignments that I have implemented as well as recent student work.